Above the Mist

A Golden Glow

Ding-ding! Uncle Bo rang the morning bell. Lina and Sami ran to the round window of the tree station. On the table, the leaf-map was glowing gold, and its brightest line pointed up, up, to the rope bridge in the treetops.

Tuki Squeezes Through

Tuki wanted to come too. But Tuki's beak was bigger than the door! Bonk. He tried again. Bonk! Then Tuki tipped his head sideways and squeezed out, pop! Sami laughed so hard he had to sit down.

Into Nothing

The rope bridge had soft net walls and strong rails. But the far end disappeared into thick white mist. Sami stopped. "It goes into nothing," he whispered. "I don't want to fall into nothing."

One Step

Uncle Bo knelt down. "I'll be right behind you." Lina held out her hand. "Let's count." Sami held the rail very tight. He took one step. "One." The bridge swayed a little. He took another. "Two."

Inside the Cloud

Now everything was white. White in front, white behind. Only the leaf-map glowed, gold and warm. "Seven, eight, nine," counted Sami. Tiny drops of mist sparkled on his fringe. He kept on walking.

The Top of the Tree

"Twenty!" Sami's boots bumped onto a wide wooden platform at the very top of the tallest tree. Just then, the sun peeked out. The mist began to slide down, down, down.

Above the Clouds

And there it was! The "nothing" was a cloud, and now they stood above it. Treetops poked up like green islands in a white sea. "The trees breathe out water," said Uncle Bo, "and it helps make the clouds." Sami gasped. "We're higher than a cloud!"

A Golden Leaf

A golden leaf floated down and landed in Sami's hand. Back at the station, he put it on the wonder shelf. "I crossed the bridge into nothing," Sami told Tuki. Tuki tipped his big beak, as if to say, "And it was something!"
