When Halloween Is Finished

The Next Morning

Halloween was yesterday. Today is a new day. The paper pumpkins are still on our wall, but the party is finished. I look at them for a long time. I wanted Halloween to last longer.

I Miss It

I hold my folded costume. “I miss Halloween,” I tell Dad. He sits beside me. “You had a lovely time. It can feel sad when something you like is over.” He stays while I have my feeling.

One Thing to Keep

Dad brings a little box. I choose a photograph of my costume to put inside. In the picture, my arms are spread like bat wings. The day is finished. The photograph can stay.

A Small Goodbye Job

I put one paper pumpkin garland in the box. Dad takes care of the other decorations. I can help with a little part, or watch. We close the lid together. The box will be on our low shelf.

What Comes Next

Dad tells me our next small plan: breakfast, then a book. I know my chair at the table. I know where the books are. Today does not have to feel like yesterday. It has familiar things of its own.

Today and Yesterday

After breakfast, I choose a book and sit beside Dad. My keepsake box rests on the shelf. I still miss a little bit of Halloween. I also want to see what happens on the next page.
